Friday arrived and the plan was in place. During pregame warm ups, Rodgers watched Pat and his teammates do what looked like slow motion jumping jacks. Rodgers knew the opposing team was preparing for the their protest.

The game began. Immediately, Pat dropped to the floor for his first snow angel. “BUNSEN BURNER!” Rodgers yelled, which was the signal word him and Cooper came up with. Cooper, crouched on the sideline, removed a small, white, plastic box from his backpack. He placed it on the floor and peeled back the lid. Two mice zipped across the gym.

Pat saw the rodent’s racing toward him and popped up. The crowd shrieked with surprise. Oblivious, two of Pat’s teammates started their snow angels. “BUNSEN BURNER!” Rodgers called, and three more mice scurried across the floor. The Kettle Cross players popped up and the game continued. Every so often, another protester tryed a snow angel. Rodgers yelled “BUNSEN BURNER!” and Cooper set another mouse free.

Before long, the crowd was in an uproar. Players periodically flopped to the floor to make snow angels, only to jump up again when they saw mice darting in there direction. At the height of the madness, Principal Mellon entered the gym. Superintendent Chase followed closely behind.
